My Full Stops

They boast no circumlocution that precedes them and no verbosities that onward march.

They're fully rounded with a well-filled core, elegantly keeping their firm ground like the fortified citadels of medieval times.

People have heeded their forcefulness, especially those of the oral type, taciturn signals indicating a pause as irreversible as the course of stars, eliminating flattery and compromise.

Indissoluble

This compunction that soaks in the acid of your mind is impossible to dissolve, no matter how you try.
It is impervious to every corrosion your cerebration has devised, and it's bound to haunt you for the remainder of your life.

It was conceived in the womb of guilt that your callousness defies, but there are limits to insensitivity like yours, for indifference cannot simply camouflage what your subconscious will keep alive until your demise.

You were entrusted with hearts, but your treachery is an embedded rite in a nature that is conditioned to betray whatever is innately sublime.

Warfare

[Power Rationing]

I feel like a mouse who was ordained for the lab.
They impose blackouts to see how I react.
My body exudes in the darkness chemicals that constitute the facts of a scientist's repast.

[Suffocation]

I feel like a moth who is grounded for life.
The transparent dome above me is a psycho's empty wine glass, entertaining his mind with the slow process of my demise.

Winter

When rain distorts the only view my window commands of cerulean blue, I think of shoes with invisible holes, of padded coats that mannequins boast, of umbrellas reclining in expensive stores, of gorgeous hats that a few afford, of warmth emanating from heated walls.

A woman who'd lost her faith in God once told me that Winter was created for those who purchase fur and high karat gold, who roast chestnuts on genuine logs, who defy the ice that surrounds their homes, who flaunt underwear and silky shorts, who grumble about the surplus of warmth.
