At the urging of a friend who has always been on the cutting edge of communications technology, I recently submitted:

Embracing Transgender Identity to be searched on an AI site. To my astonishment, in no more than ten seconds I received a full outline for a book on understanding and navigating transgender experience.

I sent this AI-created outline to numerous friends, telling them I was thinking of using AI to write my next book, or rather to “generate” my next book. Their shock and concern that after all these years I was embracing transgender identity threw me for a loop. They had completely missed the point. It was just an idea for a book, not a personal coming out. In spite of the confusion, praise for the outstanding quality of the proposed book, with its so well structured outline, was generous and solidly supportive. I wondered who at AI should take the credit. I had nothing to do with the creation of what people were finding an extremely proficient outline.

To my complete surprise, query letters that I had sent to a dozen literary agents on a whim to see what response the outline would receive, if any, produced a decent number of positive and enthusiastic replies in a little over a week, with requests from four agents to read a sample chapter, based on what one of the agents called “a wonderfully extensive and important outline.”

Within a week, as I say—as opposed to the standard three to four months it takes to receive an agent response to a query about one’s proposed book—the AI-created book proposal had prompted immediate, serious and interested replies. The agents made it sound like the book could go places, what with the current media topicality of the “transgender movement” throughout the West.

I got to thinking that with all this attention and approving reaction to AI’s efforts, maybe it was time to bite the binary bullet, abandon my own intelligence and embrace the artificial one everyone seemed so impressed by.

What harm could it do?
