

Poetic Workshop: First Draft

Birch and Maple, A.Y. Jackson

Langston's First Attempt

Hug tightly, snuggle up to trees
For if trees die
~~Life is~~ life's a broken wounded-winged wombat
That can never fly again—even in the pitiest of days.
Hug tightly and smosh your buttocks closely up to trees
For trees greet you if you stand in life's barren field
fending off the sleet that condensates around you.

Joyce's Scribbling on the Back of a Napkin

I think that I shall never see
A poem as lovely as the woods.
The woods whose hungry appetite is never sated
Against the earth's sweet flowing is fated;
The woods which look at God all day,
As they lift their leafy arms to pray;
The woods that oft in Summer wear
A nest of chickadees in their hair;
Upon whose branches sleet has lain
Who intimately live with rain.
Poems are made by fools like me,
But only God can make the woods.

Ed's First Attempt

Whose bells these are I think I know.
His Rectory's in the village though;
He will not see me stopping here
To listen to his bells toiling with grief.
My inner ear must think it queer
To stop without an abbey near
Between the bells and frozen lake.
The darkest eventide of year.
I give my cochlea hair a shake
To ask if there is some mistake.
The only other sound's the snore
of Quasimodo as he guards his bells

His bells, bells, bells, bells, bells, bells, bells
The bells are that are so lovely, loud and mellow.
But I must hurry on to my fellow
The brother of my Annabelle Lee,
Who waits for me

Who waits for me.

Hear the sledges dragging trees—

Silvery, gossamer trees!

What a world of merriment their leafy green foretells!

How they blink, twizzle and suddenly sizzle,

In the icy air of night!

While the stars that over sprinkle

All the heavens, seem to twinkle

With a crystal meth delight;

Keeping minute, minute, minute,

In a Christian kind of synod

To the tickling, flickering, brickeling that so dramatically
wells

From the trees, trees, trees, trees,

trees, trees, trees—

From the jingling and the tinkling of the trees.
