

Three Poems

by Peter Lopatin (November 2020)

Avenue in Schloss Kammer Park, Gustav Klimt, 1912

An Ordinary Day at the Park

There's a circular path at the park by the shore.

My occasional walk there just before dark,
is always counterclockwise.

Some go the other way

and I watch them as they pass.

No rules given in advance tell us how to acknowledge the clock, or even if its ubiquity must impose a temporal stance.

My timeless companion – with me from the start – insists that I'm in thrall to an image, a picture whose art is distortion.

The mechanical metaphor, he says, is a common

vulgarity, a mental tic from which no clarity can ensue. I don't deny his point.

But still my direction is against the clock,

and the ones who go the other way round

(though their case is no less sound)

seem to me to have consented to a terrible atrocity.

"Surely there's some mistake," I say. "Can't I make you see?

If you persist in this you'll only come to grief."

My companion – who is me in every way but one –

returns to his home within. I pause now on the path as a woman with two kids – the little one not far past birth –

begins her clockwise circuit.

They are all laughter and mirth. They know something I don't,

able to go with time that way, like the seagulls

who have learned to break mollusk shells by

dropping them to the ground from thirty feet up, exposing the guts so they can eat their fill.

I hear the shells crack and watch as
the birds

tear the entrails out, greedy for life.

The older boy shouts in glee at the sight.

Perhaps tomorrow, if I'm bolder, I'll set myself aright.

I'll go the other way round, ignoring the ghostly dead, and as the gulls wheel overhead I'll feel the satisfaction of the kill and what I imagine

the unreflective hunger of a beast is like.

Perhaps, as I walk with the clock, I'll tear at my bloody sustenance like the frenzied birds

who need no talk. But today I think of time and the dead and walk the circle as I always have, arrogant with hope and fresh with dread.

Pantoum of the Air Raid Drills—1958

Because I hated school,
I took quite well to air raid drills,
their welcome interruption, their concrete rule,
the promise of safety from atomic kill.

I took quite well to air raid drills,
bent beneath my desk, head to knee,
savoring my safety from atomic kill,
waiting to see what survivors see.

Bent beneath my desk, head to knee,
waiting for the never mind of the all-clear,
waiting to see what survivors see.

But the harpy, Mrs. Miles, was my darkest fear.

Waiting for the never mind of the all-clear,
I wondered: why does she walk the aisles,
that harpy, Mrs. Miles, who was my darkest fear?
(A Gorgon marching to the firestorm, all smiles).

I wondered: why does she walk the aisles,
immune from gamma rays and atomic flame,

(a Gorgon marching to the firestorm, all smiles)

watching us, each in turn, our darkest fear the same?

Immune from gamma rays and atomic flame,

impervious in her dark oblivion,

watching us, each in turn, our darkest fear the same:

(to become this carnivore's common carrion).

She was impervious in her dark oblivion to our grasp at safety through a concrete rule.

I was a carnivore's fetid carrion:

I could not have not hated school.

Rowing for My Life

I took the rowboat out alone that day. You warned me not to do it.

The ozone was heavy in the quivering air, the lake vitreous and still beneath a grey efflorescence looming in the west.

You thought I would know that to be out on a lake under threat of a storm

is something not to do. You were too young to know that a boy of ten has a thing or two to prove, and must do precisely what he should not, so that his competence and his will become established things like the tree he should not climb to the top and the railroad tracks he must never cross.

When I passed the middle of the lake, my honor on the chopping block, no lightning bolt could turn me back, though I knew it should. You ran away, a prudent girl, as I pulled hard on the oars, heading for the log hut on the other side.

I did the stupid thing I had to do, and had no one to tell about it but you.

(But you already knew and disapproved.) I rowed back, wet and cold, and felt the strange commingling of pride and foolishness that I would come to know so well.

«Previous Article Table of Contents Next Article»

Peter Lopatin was born and raised in New York where he earned his JD degree and practiced corporate law for thirty years. Along the way, he studied philosophy as a graduate student at the New School for Social Research. After retiring from his legal practice, he obtained a Certificate from the New School in teaching English as a Second Language and has been an ESL teacher since then. He has taught at the University of Connecticut/Stamford, Norwalk Community College, Manhattanville College and, most recently, at the Stamford English Language Academy. Peter's short stories and book reviews have appeared in Commentary, The Weekly Standard, The New Atlantis, and New English Review. His poetry has appeared in New Millennium Writings and Poetry East.

Follow NER on Twitter @NERIconoclast