Two Poems

by Michael Williams (October 2020)

Yellow Sky, Milton Avery, 1958

Recipient of Mustard Seed

Recipient of mustard seed And told to move Denali, I gaped in mute perplexity In that unhaunted valley,

As lonely as a teardrop shed
Upon a desert dune,
Compelled to irrigate that waste
As barren as the moon.

Was it a promise or a warning;
Is it hope or is it threat?
Does He command what can't be done,
Or is He just all wet?

Such is an expectation that

Can make you weep a fountain,
When you can't find a precedent

Of one that moved a mountain.

Self-Rebuke

it can be difficult to buck up when you're convinced that you're a fuck-up your friends may tell you otherwise try to believe their honest lies allay the dearth of hope with pleasure the nervous system's buried treasure that bullion to coinage shape by which you purchase your escape

but saturnine reality casts a pall on levity night envelops joys diurnal life is short and hell's eternal since the pursuit of merriment will rarely ever make a dent in the iron gauze that parts the joy we crave and our sad hearts

perhaps the moody melancholic instead of finding ways to frolic might bear the crucifixion labor and try to serve his god and neighbor for love—not pleasing fancy's bliss and its attendant sacrifice and some degree of self-control make happy the unhappy soul

«Previous Article Table of Contents Next Article»

Michael Williams is a Catholic convert, a crude man of letters, a bleeding heart and a goofball. He—like St. Francis—is wedded to poverty, but with moderate success. His interests (apart from writing) include smoking cigarettes, drinking beer and whiskey, reading history books, playing chess, and entertaining his friends. He lives in Anchorage, Alaska with his faithful kitty, Olivia. He has been published in the St. Austin Review and the Catholic Anchor.

Follow NER on Twitter ONERIconoclast