

Bobby Jindal Steps Up on Islam, No-Go Zones, and the Necessity for the Full Assimilation of Muslim Immigrants

(a report in UK tabloid the Daily Mail that purported to highlight the challenges facing law enforcement in such areas.)

Earlier in the interview, Jindal acknowledged: “I knew by speaking the truth we were gonna make people upset.”

Jindal was also unable to offer examples during an earlier interview with CNN’s Max Foster, saying that he’s “heard from folks here that there are neighborhoods where women don’t feel comfortable going in without veils...We all know that there are neighborhoods where police are less likely to go into.”

In the speech, Jindal suggests the rise of such no-go zones has contributed to growing anti-semitism throughout Europe, which has prompted many Jews to emigrate from their home countries.

“How does such evil rise again in democratic countries?” Jindal asks, according to the prepared remarks.

“I believe it is because radical Islamists have been given too wide a berth to establish their own nation within a nation,” he adds.

Earlier in the address, Jindal sets responsibility for the violence perpetrated by Islamic radicals in the name of their religion squarely on the shoulders of the nation of Islam, and Muslim practitioners.

He says "it is clear that far too many [Muslims]" agree with those radicals, and "they must be stopped."

And he declares: "Islam has a problem."

"If Islam does not support what is happening in the name of Islam, then they need to stand up and stop it. Many Islamic leaders argue that these are the acts of a radical few," Jindal says.

"Ok, it is their problem, and they need to deal with it."

The Louisiana governor goes on to call for Muslim leaders to "condemn anyone who commits these acts of violence, and clearly state that these people are evil and are enemies of Islam."

"Muslim leaders must make clear that anyone who commits acts of terror in the name of Islam is in fact not practicing Islam at all," he said. "If they refuse to say this, then they are condoning these acts of barbarism. There is no middle ground."...
