

How pandering PC Labour councillors helped create the UK's jihadi breeding ground:

\(here\). The notorious Trojan Horse school take-over plot \(here\) The Jihadists who trained at a Solihull Paintball centre ‘too white and Jewish’ Parviz Khan who plotted to kidnap and behead a british soldier several years before the murder of Lee Rigby.

Only a generation ago, the back-to-back terraces around Ladypool Road were populated by a very different community. The residents were made up of indigenous locals and families from Ireland, attracted by cheap housing and employment...began a process of irreversible change that culminated in mass, uncontrolled immigration under New Labour.

No one has witnessed the transformation of Sparkbrook more closely than businessman Steve Mills, who opened his garage in 1988.

Back then, in the unit next door, was a business supplying beer to local pubs. There was also a family butchers' shop. Across the road, a factory which made the famous Avery weighing scales. One by one, they began to disappear. The old Avery factory is now an Islamic community centre.

‘I think I'm the last [non-Muslim] business left,’ said father-of two Mr Mills, 54. ‘I don't think I know of any others.’

Many Muslims living here today can trace their origins to the divided state of Kashmir, which has been the centre of an endless territorial dispute between Pakistan and India.

The Kashmir connection is significant. Throughout the Nineties, Kashmiri militants, fighting for an independent Kashmir, travelled to Birmingham openly to raise funds for the cause and inspire young local Muslims to join the fight.

Many of the 26 jihadists revealed to have come from Sparkbrook – and the four neighbouring council wards featured in the Henry Jackson Society report – used Kashmiri militant groups as ‘stepping stones’ to join Al Qaeda.

Back in Ladypool Road, in the heart of the Balti Triangle, there is a restaurant at one end of the street with a function room upstairs. In the immediate aftermath of 9/11, a call to arms was issued to young Muslims during a gathering at these premises, which have now changed hands.

One of the speakers that night was young firebrand calling himself Zahir..real name... Umran Javed.

‘I am a Muslim first and foremost. We will never be accepted by the Kufr [‘unbeliever’] so we should never pander to their whims or support their actions like some so-called Muslims have been doing. If they continue to do so, it is our duty to persuade them not to. But if they do not listen, they are Kufr too and so it is our duty to fight and even kill them.’

Could there be a more chilling insight into the mindset of an Islamic terrorist or a greater betrayal of everything this country has done for him and his family?

Like Moinal Abedin, Britain’s first Al Qaeda-inspired terrorist, Umran Javed is now also back on the streets of Birmingham.
