ISIS has singled out crowded London streets as "ideal targets" for supporters to mow down pedestrians in the latest edition of the terror group's online magazine.

Published in ten languages, the most recent issue of ISIS' magazine Rumiya published tutorials on arson, knife and vehicle attacks, naming Regent Street and Piccadilly Circus in London as locations at which jihadis should "flatten [non-Muslims] under trucks" The locations are close to where a metal barrier almost half a mile long was recently erected by police.

Methods ISIS recommends for obtaining such a vehicle include taking one "from a kafir [non-Muslim] by force or deception", or by "'borrowing' from a kafir or murtadd [apostate]."

"The language of force, the language of killing, stabbing and slitting throats, chopping off heads, flattening them under trucks, and burning them alive, until they give the jizyah [non-believer's tax] while they are in a state of humiliation," reads a paragraph from Rumiya's latest edition.

In the magazine, the Islamist perpetrators of truck attacks in Nice and Berlin are praised as "heroic" along with Westminster attacker Khalid Masood who ran down four people in his car in March, and stabbed a policeman to death. Outdoor festivals, markets and rallies are also listed as potential targets.

ISIS also urged its followers to use sales and personals adverts websites such as eBay and Craigslist to lure unsuspecting victims to "an appropriate location before attacking, subduing, binding and then slaughtering them."

The terror group said the goal of taking hostages is “not to ask for a ransom, but to create a massacre, and instill terror. “Take hostages for slaughter, not to start negotiations ... The victims must be killed before the police arrived,” the group states, praising the Bataclan massacre in Paris as a successful attack with “89 dead and 200 wounded crusaders.”
