A Islamist hate cleric's talk has been cancelled after a GB News investigation.

Enayet Ullah Abbasi was due to speak at a venue in London (yesterday) evening (Wednesday 21st)

But after the council were told about his comments which included him saying those who criticised the Prophet Muhammad should have their head "chopped off" and praising of 9/11 terrorists, the event was scrapped.

GB News spoke to the venue in East London who confirmed talks with organisers, police and Newham Council resulted in the conference being pulled. They are not saying where it was to be, and while I found social media announcing his talks in Luton and Leicester the London venue wasn't openly advertised. Although there are several mosques large enough, I suspect from the discretion this was a more general for hire building.

Yesterday he delivered a speech in Birmingham after arriving in the UK last week.

And GB News understands Abbasi spoke in Nottingham as part of a country-wide tour.

The Home Office was blasted for allowing the Bangladeshi hate cleric into the country.

GB News has seen correspondence from a London Borough of Newham councillor who wrote to a concerned citizen: "The event has now been cancelled, please could you let others know and thank you bringing this to our attention once again.”

A British Bangladeshi who raised concerns with GB News about the hate cleric said: “It is good to know that the Newham council has cancelled tomorrow’s event as there is possible threats to British society.” On condition of anonymity due to fears of attacks for speaking out, they added: “Abbassi is a dangerous figure who should never have been allowed to come to Britain. No hate preachers should be allowed to come to Britain who might use extremist religious views to radicalise, encourage or influence any nation or communities.”
