

Ivan Rioufol: The European Model Is Contested

The unhappiness and general malaise in Europe is usually discussed in economic terms, and Greece is the obvious example.. But surely the Europe-wide phenomena of waves of migrants from North African shores, the resulting welfare costs, and the expense of dealing with Islamic threats at every level, have effects on Europe's sense of wellbeing – both from the recent upsurge in Muslim immigration and from those Muslim migrants in place for years who remain steadfastly unassimilated – that are much more than a matter of economics. Ivan Rioufol chooses to concentrate on the economics in his article on Greece here.