

London based Charity backing anti-Israel rallies has state cash pulled

Andrew Gilligan in the London University's School of Oriental and African Studies \(SOAS\), was the London launch of Israeli Apartheid Week, held across UK university campuses to "raise awareness about Israel's ongoing settler-colonial project" and demand boycotts of Israel. They were secretly recorded and passed to the Telegraph.

War on Want spent more than £1,000 to bring Sahar Francis, a Palestinian lawyer, to the UK for the London event. Ms Francis, the head of the Addameer prisoners' rights group, spoke of a "rumour" that Israelis were stealing organs from Palestinian victims of the violence.

"The eyes were looking in a very strange way and this is why the families suspected [Israel] are stealing their [organs]," she said. "But we cannot confirm, because [in] most cases it was not ending up with [an] autopsy."

It was a decision by Oxford University Labour Club to endorse Israeli Apartheid Week which triggered the row about anti-Semitism within Labour.

The club's co-chairman,
