

Murdered policeman named, attack was Islamist and police know who he is.

Update Thursday morning from the London Evening Standard

The policeman was named on Wednesday evening as Keith Palmer, a 48-year-old husband and father, who was a member of the Diplomatic Protection Service.

Mr Palmer later died despite frantic efforts to save him by bystanders including a serving MP.

Five people including police officer Keith Palmer were killed in London's bloodiest terror attack since 7/7.

Around 40 people were injured as a car mowed down pedestrians on Westminster Bridge while terrified tourists ran for their lives.

The knifeman then stabbed a policeman before being shot dead by armed officers near the Houses of Parliament.

The policeman was named on Wednesday evening as Keith Palmer, a 48-year-old husband and father, who was a member of the Diplomatic Protection Service.

Mr Palmer later died despite frantic efforts to save him by bystanders including a serving MP.

A woman was also among those who died in the attack, which is the bloodiest since the 7/7 London bombings in 2005 when 56 people were killed. Three other police officers were also injured during the carnage.

The Met's acting deputy commissioner and head of counter terrorism Mark Rowley confirmed on Wednesday evening that five people were killed, including the police officer and his attacker.

He said police were treating the attack as Islamist-related terrorism.
