Pinpointing the Exact Moment John McCain Lost His Mind

It's hard, I know, but he just said the Rand Paul was working for Vladimir Putin because he wouldn't go along with a bill to bring Montenegro into NATO.

Sen. John McCain on Wednesday directly accused fellow Republican Sen. Rand Paul of working for Russian President Vladimir Putin. While speaking from the Senate floor in support of a bill advancing Montenegro's bid to join NATO, McCain noted objection from the Kentucky senator, saying, "You are achieving the objectives of Vladimir Putin… trying to dismember this small country which has already been the subject an attempted coup." He continued: "If they object, they are now carrying out the desires and ambitions of Vladimir Putin and I do not say that lightly." Several moments later, after McCain asked for unanimous consent to move the bill forward, Sen. Paul raised his objection and then exited the room. This set off McCain, who railed against Paul: "I note the senator from Kentucky leaving the floor without justification or any rationale for the action he has just taken. That is really remarkable, that a senator blocking a treaty that is supported by the overwhelming number, perhaps 98—at least—of his colleagues would come to the floor and object and walk away." He then directly connected Paul to the Russians: "The only conclusion you can draw when he walks away is he has no justification for his objection to having a small nation be part of NATO that is under assault from the Russians. So I repeat again, the senator from Kentucky is now working for Vladimir Putin."

Uh, yeah.
