

Tavistock Square

As has been their custom since 2006 members of March for England and friends, of which I am pleased to be considered one, attended Tavistock Square to lay flowers on the memorial to those London travellers who were killed by the Muslim suicide bomber on that site on 7th July 2005.

All was done with usual dignity and decorum. This year on behalf of the New English Review I chose pink roses.

