

Telling the truth about Israel is a new Catch-22 situation

If you tell the truth about Israel or Islam, you will be boycotted by the mainstream/left-stream media, no matter who you are.

by Phyllis Chesler

Earlier this month, I wrote a A Politically Incorrect Feminist". After a good conversation which lasted more than an hour, she suddenly said: "But now I must ask you to explain or justify why you are a Zionist." Said I: "But I don't write about that in this book." Said she: "But it's important, we need to know."

No matter what else I may be talking about, this kind of Kafkaesque interrogation has become my lot. My reputation always precedes me.

So, what did I do? Of course, I pulled the piece about the Women's March leadership away from the feminist website and sent it to Israel National News and, within hours, my editor there published it. Now, feminists could say that because I published at a conservative and pro-Israel venue, they no longer had to read my words. Indeed, someone challenged me about this on Facebook. I responded that the New York Times no longer publishes my work. People were shocked, just shocked.

Back in 2004, I wrote a piece about what I called "Israel National News".
