

Tommy Robinson found to be in contempt of court at retrial.

I am on holiday at the moment, away from London in an area where WiFi access is patchy, to put it mildly. But this evening I have managed to catch up with the news of Tommy Robinson's retrial at the Old Bailey and friends who attended outside in support.

To be brief he was convicted again and will be sentenced again next week. As he is out on bail until then I have hopes for either a non custodial sentence, or at the worst a term commensurate with that already served. But I'm not hopeful; the establishment wants to set traffic warden ticketed the bus from which Tommy and others spoke outside the court for parking violations (everywhere in London is a potential violation, Londoners treat it as an extra random tax)

A traffic warden cackled with laughter yesterday after slapping the Tommy Robinson support bus with a parking ticket. Despite being booed by hecklers, the man openly grinned and told cameras 'I do love my job sometimes,' as he walked away from the crowd.

Speakers included one of the grooming gang's victims and a former policewoman. I can't access her speech yet but I'm told she spoke of the instructions given nationwide to officers as to how to play down the allegations made by young girls.

The Independent newspaper did a live blog over both more measured

Ezra Levant of Rebel Media