"I think we ought to start [surveillance] up again, and we ought to start it up this morning. We ought to start it up again and get going. And use your head. This is a lot of nonsense that we ended that," he went on.

The program was a "good thing" that yielded "frankly good information," he remarked. "And I think we ought to start it up and not be naive and not be stupid. And they ought to start that up immediately."

"As far as weapons, they'll use anything they can get," Trump said of terrorists, mocking concerns about a potential erosion of civil liberties. "These people will use anything – they're not worried about 'Oh gee, this isn't ethical.' These are not people that are politically correct."

A federal Yahoo News published Thursday, Trump did not rule out warrantless searches or registering Muslims in a database.

"We're going to have to do things that we never did before. And some people are going to be upset about it, but I think that now everybody is feeling that security is going to rule," Trump told Yahoo in response to a question about the searches. "And certain things will be done that we never thought would happen in this country in terms of information and learning about the enemy. And so we're going to have to do certain things that were frankly unthinkable a year ago." ...
